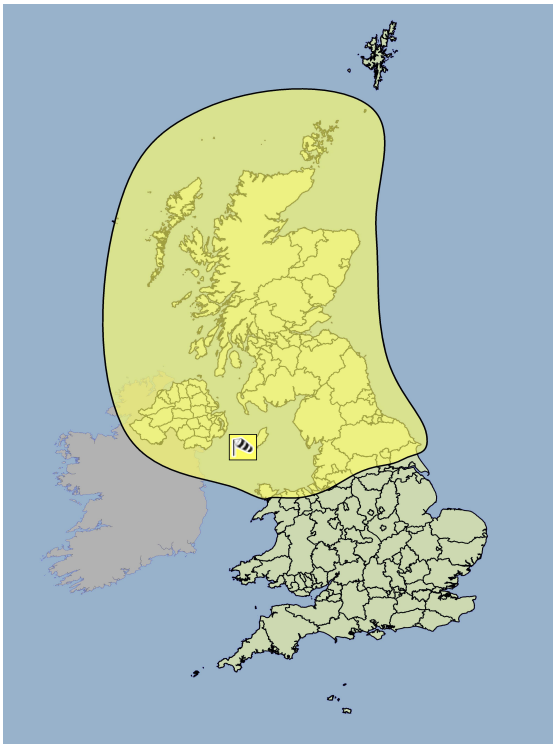
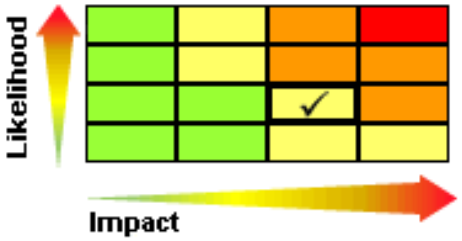
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A large, vigorous area of low pressure will pass just to the north of Scotland later on Monday and early Tuesday. This will bring a swathe of very strong west or southwesterly winds across much of the UK, especially northern areas.

This warning has been updated to extend the validity time slightly further into Tuesday morning,

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Wind

Valid from 10:15 on Mon, 01st Feb 2016 until 10:00 on Tue, 02nd Feb 2016

Southwesterly gales will continue to affect northern parts of the UK during Monday, strengthening further to bring locally severe gales by Monday night before easing on Tuesday morning. Gusts of 60 mph are likely quite widely, with up to 70 mph in more exposed spots. Much of Scotland is covered by an associated amber wind warning, where winds will be stronger still and there is a risk of higher levels of disruption.

Please be aware of the risk of disruption to transport as well as power supplies, with some structural damage also possible.
